Definition of “social impact”

The term “social impact” refers to "the social and environmental outcomes resulting from a project, including both short- and long-term changes. Social impact is characterized by the following four points:

- Changes occur not only in the long-term results, but also in the short term.
- It includes not only the impact of large-scale projects, but also small-scale and individual personal/psychological changes.
- It can be expressed in terms of qualitative information as well as numerical (quantified).
- It includes positive as well as negative changes.

What is a "social impact assessment"?

The assessment is aimed at quantitatively and qualitatively determining “the social and environmental outcomes resulting from the project, including both short- and long-term changes,” and visualizing the value of the project. The objectives of the social impact assessment are as follows:

1. To be used for learning and improvement in the project

The objective is to improve project management and organizational practices by sharing strategies and results pertaining to social impact within the project applicant’s organization, enhancing understanding of the project/organization, and providing materials to assist with decision-making.

The assessment will create opportunities to review project content and goals, since project validation will be conducted in the process of conducting the evaluation, and this leads to organizational growth.

2. Accountability to contributors (the Fund) and project stakeholders

The objective is to disclose strategies and results pertaining to social impact on external stakeholders.

Because the social value created by the project will become clear, it will facilitate communication with the Fund and stakeholders and publicize the social effectiveness of the project.

What is “Output”?

“Output” refers to direct results from project activities (activities), such as the services they provide. It is expressed in terms of conditions or numbers, regardless of the project outcomes (outcomes).

e.g. Number of activities, duration of activities, number and attributes of participants, number and quality of materials distributed, conditions occurring for participants, etc.

■ Output (direct results)

- Number of activities
- Number of participants

What is “outcome”?

“Outcome” refers to the changes, benefits, and results of the project output. This includes changes that appear as direct or indirect impacts on the beneficiaries, their surroundings and stakeholders, or the target of the project, after the implementation of the project. For beneficiaries, it includes changes in knowledge, motivation, behavior, attitudes, and skills, and for institutions, policy changes.

■ Outcome (results)

- Changes (changes in feelings, changes in behavior)
- Benefits (creation of a beneficial environment, etc.)

(Example)

| Target/Interested Party | Projects and Activities | Outcome (Results) |
|-------------------------|---|---|
| Children | Kid's cafeteria | (Short-term) Improved nutritional intake, sense of well-being (Long-term) Disease prevention, healthy growth |
| Nature/plants | Mountain trail maintenance, guidance for climbers | (Short-term) Plant conservation (Long-term) Ensuring biodiversity, preservation of water resources |

Selection of indicators to measure “outcomes”

There are a variety of outcome indicators and measurement methods, including quantitative and qualitative methods. It is desirable to select indicators according to the evaluation objectives, the needs of the Fund/stakeholders for the information related to the social impact, and the resources available to the project applicant.
